Methodology and organization of psychological management of plastic surgery patients

Despite high demand for plastic surgery services, some patients are not satisfied with outcomes of interventions. They assume that they experience personality problems, social isolation, problems with relations with their family and friends. That is why they demand a revision surgery and express indignation and even anger against their surgeon and other clinic staff. Psychological follow-up of plastic surgery patients improves the quality of medical care and can help prevent potential negative reactions on the part of patients. It is very important to understand, that a consultation by psychologist is part of general preoperative examination and rather than diagnosing the abnormality, the psychologist strives to help patient define and, if needed, modify his (her) motivation and expectations about the intervention. This way the psychologist provides great support to the surgeon, by excluding pathological motivation and unrealistic expectations, identifying patients with psychological issues.
